Historical Sketch

Established in 1902, the Pan American Health Organization (PAHO) symbolized a “joint effort and solidarity among nations, as does the establishment of the U.S.-Mexico Border Field Office in 1942, at the request of both countries.” The ultimate goal of the Pan American Health Organization (PAHO) and its sister institution, the United States-Mexico Border Health Association (USMBHA), was to better health education, health, and the environment in the border region. In particular, the Pan American Health Organization sought to improve medical care and health coverage for vulnerable groups, which included: mothers, children, workers, the poor, the elderly, refugees, and displaced persons. PAHO also publicized the lack of sanitary living conditions on the border, rates of tuberculosis, instances of rabies transmitted by dogs, and rates of sexually transmitted infections.

PAHO served as a regional office for the Americas of the World Health Organization (WHO), and together, they are members of the United Nations system. The Pan American Health Organization field office in the border region closed on December 31, 2013, though there are still offices located across the United States and other countries.
